CLIMATE CHANGE, FISCAL POLICY, AND MACROECONOMIC DYNAMICS IN AFRICA

The frequency and severity of climate-related disasters have significantly increased and are expected to continue growing. This has sparked considerable interest in assessing the economic costs of these disasters and climate change risks. It is widely recognized that mitigation and adaptation measures are essential and must be implemented promptly. Kumar and Maiti (2024) highlighted that delaying these actions would exacerbate irreversible environmental damage and economic instability. The European Central Bank (ECB) and other policymakers are increasingly troubled that, while these measures effectively reduce CO<sub>2</sub> emissions, they may exert inflationary and recessionary pressures on the economy. Conversely, some experts argue that these strategies are disinflationary and could benefit the economy. From a fiscal perspective, the impact of climate change mitigation and adaptation strategies may vary. For instance, according to the double-dividend theory, carbon taxes may invigorate the economy. It is suggested that these taxes can enable reductions in other taxes, such as capital and income taxes, thereby boosting economic activity. Furthermore, these taxes can be utilized to reduce government debt burdens and, in turn, alleviate concerns about fiscal sustainability while automatically promoting investment and economic growth.

Developing countries, particularly those in Africa, face greater exposure to climate change risks due to geographic factors and varying levels of development, which hinder their mitigation and adaptation capabilities (Kumar and Maiti, 2024). Despite their constrained abilities in these areas, these nations cannot afford to postpone necessary actions. Delaying such measures may lead to costs that are difficult to manage given their limited fiscal resources.

These issues warrant an innate understanding of the multifaceted challenges, confronting developing countries in dealing with climate change and associated risks. Against this background, we invite theoretical and empirical papers and abstracts OR abstracts exploring, but not limited to, the following themes:

- The macroeconomic consequences of climate change
- The welfare effects of climate change
- The macroeconomic impact of Green fiscal reforms
- Monetary policy consequences of climate change mitigation and adaptation strategies
- The role of monetary-fiscal policy coordination in fighting climate change
- Optimal mix of green fiscal policy reforms. It is a mix of what? green fiscal policy reforms and
- Climate change, climate change-related reforms, and productivity.

SIDE TRACK

Theme: “Entrepreneurship, Innovation and Inclusive Sustainable Development in Africa”

This side track brings together scholars and practitioners to share contemporary research and debate the future of entrepreneurship, innovation, and inclusive sustainable development in Africa. We invite papers and abstracts to explore a wide range of themes, including entrepreneurial ecosystems, policy frameworks, climate change and green entrepreneurship, technopreneurship, and AI for sustainable development.
